FROM the PASTOR: Mark Tiessen-Dyck

This Easter, my preparations have been based upon the Gospel of Mark's account of the resurrection. This is somewhat unusual because we tend to reach for John on holy days. We often use the lectionary for preaching at ABC, which is a three-year cycle of scripture readings. Each year focuses on one of Matthew, Mark or Luke, with readings from John interspersed throughout each year particularly on important occasions. We are currently in the 'year of Mark', and so I accept the challenge of preaching from Mark this Easter. While Mark doesn't include the footrace to the tomb or Mary Magdalene's sudden recognition of Jesus and her sharing the news with the disciples as John does, Mark offers us something astounding as well; the opportunity to be the end of the story ourselves.

The ending of Mark has been one of the most debated matters in scholarship of the Bible. Because the best and oldest manuscripts of the New Testament do not contain verses 9-20, and even writers in the early Church recognized this, it is universally accepted that verses 9-20 were later additions. Translations of the Bible now acknowledge this by including verses 9-20 in brackets or adding a note that these verses are not included in the earliest manuscripts (flip to the end of Mark to see how your translation responds). It's possible that a Gospel ending with the women's fear (see verse 8) was too unsatisfactory for people familiar with the stories of Jesus' resurrection appearances that they were compelled to include them at a later time.

What has been debated over the centuries and still today, however, is whether the ending of Mark was lost or whether Mark intended to end his Gospel at verse 8 with the women's fear and trembling. Proponents of the former view note the fragility of papyri scrolls (with the end easily falling off) and suggest that Mark would have been familiar with Jesus' resurrection appearances and would have surely included them. But others say that ending with the women's' fear and failure to tell the disciples matches Mark's message and style.

I don't have an answer and don't need one. I stand in awe at the way the Holy Spirit works through humans to share the Good News. I trust that the resurrection accounts, each in their own way, reveal the truth that Christ has been raised from the dead. This Easter, I accept verse 8 and the women's trembling as the end of the written Gospel. Mark knows that it is not the end, the Gospel continues in our lives. How do you continue the story of resurrection? We have the opportunity to write the ending with our lives.

Christ is risen indeed!

CHURCH ANNOUNCEMENTS

- Tuesday morning coffee – join us at 10am via ZOOM.
- We hope you have been enjoying the enhanced experience with our new visual and audio system. The installation of the system required a slight configuration of the choir loft which has resulted in a surplus of two benches, which are currently being stored at the back of the loft. We are making them available to anyone who can make use of them. Please note: they are heavy! If interested, please contact the church office to arrange pickup.
- This Easter the World/Home Ministries Commission is inviting us to make a donation to MCC to help in their efforts to respond to crises around the globe.
