In the midst of the worst-yet coronavirus outbreak in Palestine, Bethlehem Bible College (BBC) invites us to pray with them for students, staff, faculty, families and all Palestinians. Pray for healing. Many have succumbed to the disease and hospitals are overwhelmed, especially due to the spread of virus variants. Pray for economic recovery in a situation that is becoming desperate due to long lockdowns, which have decimated the local tourism industry. Pray for vaccines to arrive and become widely available. This has not yet begun in Palestine, except for front-line medical workers.

FROM the PASTOR: Virginia Gerbrandt Richert

Recently our book study group at church resumed our gatherings via zoom. We are reading the book “The Inconvenient Indian: A Curious Account of Native People in North America.” This is a fascinating book that packs in way more information than any history book I have ever read, yet does so in a way that is engaging and not boring.

This past week the chapter that we discussed was on the history of residential schools and the government’s attempts to assimilate Native peoples into “white” culture. One of the harder aspects to process in this discussion was the role that Christian churches played in these schools—they ran them for the most part, and did so willingly. It seemed that the foundations of Christianity’s evangelism at the time were a natural framework for assimilation.

Our discussion moved on to the question of how have things changed? Or have they? Are we still evangelising people by telling them they have to leave everything from their own culture behind? Are we still approaching other’s cultures as if we have all the answers and they have nothing to offer us? And are there aspects of our beliefs and theology that we should be reviewing to make sure that the harm that was done in the residential schools is not repeated in a different setting?

Our discussions are rich but seem to bring up even more questions than answers. But these questions are important because they help us engage with our history and reflect on how that impacts our present.
